

Abstract

Infiltrator is a competitive strategy game centered around infiltrating the enemy state. It is played by two to four players on two different scenario boards and is designed to last between thirty and forty minutes. In Infiltrator, each player takes control of a different character, the Authority and the Resistance, which starts from two sides of the scenario board. The game is divided into a couple of different sessions, each session includes two scenarios: The Border and the City.

Rules

The player plays the role of infiltrator and defender respectively. The goal of the infiltrator is to destroy the target location defended by the defender by eliminate the main object of defender player to obtain the victory point and the defender can obtain the victory point by successfully defending those locations that are attacked by the infiltrator players. The player with the highest victory point wins the game.

Intention

Dual game scene switching and the small scale game board, the special designed dice with tactical movements on it and the skill cards which can enable the player to play like a long wolf agent who has very unique skills in the movie to defeat the enemies. With the fast-pace game experience brought by the special game sequence design, player needs to quickly make strategic judgments in the game, and rationally allocate materials to win as many victory points as possible in a limited attack round.

What I learned

This game is my first independently designed board game, I designed the game mechanics and the cards, miniatures, maps in the game all by myself. During the design process, I not only learned about the design process of game design, but also about the rules and balance design of the game. More importantly, I put my knowledge of architecture into the design to solve the problem I found in the game map design. Also I realize the in the game design process, game testing is the key to ensure that the game mechanics can work properly at the end.
